

What Happens When Two Stay-At-Home Dads Get Out?

Description

Nothing much, really, we just enjoyed a couple good beers and talked about dad life.

What? Were you expecting some crazy shenanigans with lots of booze and guys running wild chasing miniature horses or something?

I hope not, thatâ€™d be weird. And very randomâ€¦why did I even say that?

Anyway, let us move past that comment and come back to reality. I had the opportunity to meet up with another local stay-at-home dad and fellow blogger on Thursday night to discuss setting up a dadâ€™s group. Just like the last time I was allowed out of the house alone to meet my brother (Uncle Preston), we met in Fort Worth at The Flying Saucer.

Thanks to my wife, yet again, for staying home with Avery on a work night! Avery was obviously not impressed with Kelleyâ€™s attempt at taking a selfie. Or maybe it was her coldâ€¦

David Kepley is co-creator of Just a Dad 247 who blogs with his long time friend, Pat Jacobs; also a stay-at-home dad. Theyâ€™ve been in the blogging game for a while and have some great stuff for dads and really anyone. Go check them out, but then come back since Iâ€™m not finished here! ðŸ™, Kepley and I met through the Facebook Dad Bloggers group we are both members of and I have mentioned before. We were both seeking a dads group in our surrounding area and were unable to find anything, so we decided weâ€™d try to start one ourselves.

Lucky for us, we have connected with Lance Somerfeld and Matt Schneider who formed the City Dads Group which is a national organization devoted to supporting fathers everywhere. Theyâ€™ve helped dads create groups in major cities across the U.S., and weâ€™re hoping to add Dallas to their list.

Our discussion on how weâ€™ll get things up and running went well, and we are hoping to have our first meeting next month in September. Obviously, Iâ€™ll share the details here as we get more info and have a solid date/plan. Either way, Iâ€™m excited to be a part of something so important and hope Iâ€™ll be able to bring Avery to many future meet-ups with other dads and their kids.

Asides from the dad group talk, we shared our thoughts and stories around a multitude of topics; I even gave insight to how I view food and make it a huge priority to maintain a healthy family. Fortunately, while he may not be as crazy strict as I am on what to eat, he agreed with my views for the most part and didnâ€™t just get up and walk out.

Another bonus is that Kepley knows how to pick and choose a good beer. Like me, he wonâ€™t settle for the crappy, run-of-the-mill Bud Light, Coors Light, etc., he expects good stuff if heâ€™s going to drink, just as we all should! Plus, we both know how to pose for a pictureâ€™.

I think weâ€™ll get along just fine and am looking forward to working with him and other local dads to create our own Dallas City Dads group.

Are you part of a parent (mom or dad) group where you live? Any tips or stories?

Date Created
2014/08/09

default watermark