

Private or Public School: What's Best for Your Child?

Description

As a parent there are so many important decisions to make, but one of the most important you'll ever make is which school to send your child to. There are three main options when it comes to schooling in America; public school, private school and home school. Here, we run through some of the positive aspects of each option in order to help you make the right decision for your child.

Public School

The main benefit of public school is, of course, the fact that you do not have to pay for your children to attend. Not only is the schooling itself provided free of charge, so is the transport to and from school plus public schools usually have additional services such as after school clubs which are free to attend too. Due to being government funded, public school staff have to meet strict criteria and can therefore be relied upon to teach to a good standard. Public schools will also have to meet various other criteria such as having suitable alterations made in order to accommodate various disabilities.

In public schools, your child will be exposed to a wide variety of people from different backgrounds and cultures, rather than in private school where the fees often dictate that only the more privileged echelons of society are able to attend. Your instinct as a parent may be to create a perfect world for your child however, by exposing them to the real world and real people you could contribute towards their development into a well-rounded, compassionate individual.

Private School

Unlike public school, for your child to attend a private school you must pay fees. Fees vary between different schools, but they do generally require a significant income from parents. If you need help raising the funds to send your child to private school, you could always take a look at getting a loan from GoBear.com. However, due to the funds you are paying, you will often find that private schools have better facilities. Class sizes are smaller than in public schools so the teaching can be more focused, and your child is more likely to get one on one attention from their teachers. It is not always the case but attitudes towards learning from their peers are often more positive in private schools, which helps when it comes to your child being able to focus on their education.

Because the students in private schools are taken from a smaller pool, the curriculum does not have to be so widely inclusive of lots of different needs as it would in a public school. Therefore, the curriculum is often more challenging in private schools than public schools. However, due to the smaller class sizes, if your child is struggling their needs can easily be met. Although their peers will be less diverse, it can be nice for them to be around like-minded people. Overall, private schools provide one of the safest and most supportive school environments for your child. #### Home School

If youâ€™re worried that your child is going to suffer as a result of socializing with other children, you could opt for home schooling until they are old enough to handle the challenge. This is also a good option if youâ€™re worried that your child will miss out due to the lack of individual attention in public schools, but you cannot afford to send them to private school. Home schooling does require a lot of time and effort from you as a parent, but you could always hire private tutors to help you.

There are lots of benefits to each type of schooling; the one on one attention they would get from home schooling, the safe, top-quality environment of a private school and the diverse, standard driven environment of a public school. Hopefully with this information you will be able to make a more informed choice on where to send you child. For more help with parenting challenges, take a look at going-dad.com.
