2. Use Family Photos

Artwork is not limited to prints by artists and photographs. Your artwork is anything you hang on a wall to bring about an emotional response that brings you joy and peace in your home. Family photographs are a great way to create these feelings in the home space.

You can create wall galleries of your family photographs, either of your immediate family or perhaps tracing back generations to give a real timeline of your family.

Black and white photographs of your smartphone photo dump, framed with white bordering, provide a minimalist design without compromising the number of photos you want to include.

The choice to keep it black and white with white framing makes it easy to add more art while maintaining visual balance. If you have work-related awards you'd like to frame, you can frame these here as well. It will show a great balance of your home life and your career to have these all displayed.

3. Maximize Space With Oversized Prints

If you want to make the most of space in your home, find an oversized print to hang that will take up most of the wall space. This way, you don't have to worry about finding additional artwork to fill in the extra space. If you want, try DIY framing projects with reclaimed wood to save.

4. Your Photo Symmetry

However you choose to map out your artwork on the wall, do so in symmetrical ways. Whether you organize your frames by size, shape, or spacing, keep things consistent, so your eyes can grasp a sense of balance from one piece of artwork to the next.

5. Only Buy Art You Love

The truth of the matter is that art is expensive. Whether you buy it as a digital print or as a framed piece, it still costs a lot! You can reduce costs by focusing on only those pieces you love. Your art displays should feel like a physical manifestation of your soul.

With soulful artwork, you can claim your home as yours and feel good about the purchases you've made. Don't just select a piece of work because it's on sale. Make your artwork purchases count!

Make Art Work for You
