

Our Toddler's First Green Smoothie

Description

I've been blending fruits and veggies into a pre-dinner green smoothie for my wife and I for years. But, besides Going Mom giving Avery a tiny sip from her glass, I never made one exclusively for her. Well, that just changed.

Thursday morning had her swarming around me doing the sign for milk but fussing and running away from me when I pulled out a bottle. Toddler confusion!! It only gets worse, huh?

We had bananas, and I know she loves eating them sliced and topped with NuttZo!

View this post on Instagram

“but I wanted to get her hydration needs fulfilled plus add a little extra nutrition. What better way to do that than a green smoothie?

Diligently working my way around the toddler obstruction in the kitchen, I gathered organic kale, carrots, green banana (these are great for gut health from their resistant starch), NuttZo, unsweetened almond milk, and a couple packets of stevia for sweetness.

A few minutes later, and we had ourselves Avery’s first green smoothie! What took a few minutes, felt like forever with Ms. Impatient, and she was grabbing at her sippy cup before I could hand it over.

Thatâ€™s a good sign, right? I love that sheâ€™s up for drinking whatever, even if it is dark green! To avoid spillage, I made the hand-off for her little hands to better grasp and she got right to it.

View this post on Instagram

Yeah, so we need to work on how to use straws, but the main point is that she was downing her first green smoothie! I had some too, and you could definitely taste the kale, but it was anything bad, I was quite pleased with the outcome. Iâ€™m thinking she was too.

Success! Another Avery first and another meal option opened up! I ended up replacing the straw lid with her regular sippy cup lid to avoid a mess, but a mess happened regardless. Sheâ€™s use to walking around the house with water in the cup and we donâ€™t think much of it when a little spills outâ€¦different story now.

I decided green smoothies may not appear in her sippy in the immediate future, but itâ€™s great to know sheâ€™ll drink them. There was one problem thoughâ€¦I made a giant batch of the smoothie and had a lot left over. Even after drinking a glass myself, there was plenty more, and the thing about fresh food is, it doesnâ€™t last that long.

So I did what anyone would do, I turned the green smoothie into green bread. I measured not a single ingredient, but with coconut flour, stevia, peanut flour, and baking powder, I created something similar to my Green Coconut Carrot Bread. In my microwave omelete cooker, of course.

Now we have a few batches of green smoothie bread which turned out a lot better than I thought. Itâ€™s sliced and ready for eager little fingers to snack on next time sheâ€™s demanding somethingâ€¦â€¦which is always!

Unless she has a Catch-Me-Kitty to keep her occupied, that is.

Itâ€™s the day before running the longest Iâ€™ve ran in a very long time, 13.1 miles. Kelley is running the 5k and G-Ma will be with Avery watching and cheering us on. We have rain in the forecast, so Iâ€™m interested to see how that will turn out.

Iâ€™m planning on running in my Soft Star Dash RunAmoc Shoes, but mine are the ones with bullhide leather soles which equals zero traction on wet surfaces. Only time will tell, Iâ€™ll be sure to update you early next week.

Until then, I have two lovely women, one my mom, the other my wife, to celebrate Motherâ€™s Day with after the race. We went to an awesome coffee shop called Brewed almost a year ago and will go back to treat the deserving ladies. Hope Avery doesnâ€™t make us regret waking her up so early just so we could run!

The Dad Network

Do you have green smoothies on a regular basis? If so, do your kids have them too?

Do you have a favorite recipe or just throw things in and blend like I do?

Date Created

2015/05/09

default watermark