

3D Avengers and Our Next Date Will Be Different

Description

The Avengers: Age of Ultron was not only the first movie weâ€™ve seen in almost a year, but also the first time to ever get the 3D “experience”. I put that in quotes because it really doesnâ€™t seem that special.

Here I am rocking a new belt I received from Kore Essentials before heading out on our date. Iâ€™ll post a review of the belt soon.

default watermark

View this post on Instagram

Donâ€™t worry, I quickly un-tucked my shirt after the pic (per my wifeâ€™s request), I just needed to show off that fine Evolve Buckle and Belt!

At first, 3D is cool because, well, 3D, but then itâ€™s just like any other movie but you have to wear glasses. And as a guy who already wears glasses (I try not to as much as possible), that meant I had to double up my eye-wear. So yeah, I was looking pretty Rico Suave for sure!

If we didnâ€™t have a $25 gift card to use, the 3D thing wouldnâ€™t of happened. Come to think of it, going to see a movie wouldnâ€™t of happened if we had to pay for it with our own money. Hell, we didnâ€™t even have enough to cover the $4 bottle of Dasani water after purchasing the tickets. Stupid Coca-Cola company, I donâ€™t like you getting our money!

Iâ€™m done complaining, for now at least. The movie was good, but not out-of-this-world-slap-you-in-face-fantastic. I found myself laughing at the intended jokes, but in retrospect, they seemed to joke too much and during times of immense stress. My wife noticed this right off the bat, but it took a while to set in for me. Plenty of action though, and as a boy who loves his comics, I was thrilled to see the superheroes in action.

The move was rather long, and the trailers beforehand didnâ€™t help. I found my leg getting fidgety early into the movie and didnâ€™t stop until the end. Basically, sitting is not a strong suit for either my wife or I, weâ€™d much rather be moving or at least standing.

Which is what I did when we went to the pub afterward for a beer. And a beer is all we had. Weak, I know, but we just stood there, drinking, and couldnâ€™t find much to discuss. We picked apart the movie we just watched, Kelley brought up the fact that we could have watched 3 episodes of The Walking Dead in the time it took to see the move, and we talked about Avery (of course).

We talk so much about our freedom away from our kid, but then end up missing her while weâ€™re out. We can never win! Actually, I take that back, we just need to do something different next time. By different, I mean nothing that involves sitting, not even beer. Well, maybe beer afterward, when it feels more deserved.

For instance, on our 7th anniversary, we seemed to have the most fun when we went on an impromptu kayaking trip. So, next time we agreed that going hiking, rock climbing, or even bowling will be the activity of choice. Movies are cool, but sitting is not, and $4 water from Coca-Cola definitely IS NOT!

Meanwhile, Aunt Stef and Avery seemed to have a great time and played hard while we were out. Avery gobbled up the steamed carrots, broccoli, and cauliflower with wild salmon I left, and kept taking her Aunt inside and outside multiple times.

Big thanks to my sister-in-law for watching our crazy toddler for the day! I know her daughter, Cousin Taylor, really wanted to be there but had a soccer conflict, so they plan to come back next weekend. Now, Going Mom and I just need to plan out our next date and what adventure we should go on.

Are you good at sitting through movies?

Have you ever seen a movie in 3D? Like, dislike, or donâ€™t care?

Any thoughts on a fun adventure date to take my wife on next?

Date Created
2015/05/04