

Teardrop Trailers vs. Pop-up Campers: Which Are Better?

Description

Many people like to travel on the open road. However, with rising costs, they may find they cannot do so as often as they want. Investing in a camper is one way to avoid the high costs associated with frequent travel.

When buying a camper, one must choose from many styles. Two popular choices today are pop-up and teardrop campers. Each style has benefits and drawbacks. What should a person know when making this choice?

Teardrop Campers

Teardrop campers, such as the bushwacker camper, are easily recognizable by their shape. They look exactly as the name describes. Two people easily fit in these campers, and they come with an outdoor kitchen, storage solutions, and more. These campers are both cozy and practical.

People love these charming campers, which have been around since the 1930s. What they may not realize is that the shape is intentional. The aerodynamic design allows for better fuel economy.

The campers feature hard-walled sides so the occupants are secure and protected from the elements. Setting them up takes little time and effort, so there is more time to enjoy the great outdoors. Teardrop campers don't weigh much, so they can easily be towed by a small SUV or sedan. However, they come with some drawbacks.

Teardrop campers cost more than their pop-up peers. Nevertheless, they last longer and are better built. However, they lack space, so some people will feel crowded. Don't expect to spend much time in the camper, as it is mainly intended for sleeping.

Pop-Up Campers

Pop-up campers, known as tent trailers, collapse for storage and expand when set up at a campsite. They have features similar to conventional campers while allowing users to feel like they are sleeping in a tent. Certain styles expand upwards and outwards to maximize interior space.

Pop-up campers are cost-effective and easy to tow. When this camper style is selected, the driver can see what is behind them on the road. People who want the comforts of home will find a pop-up camper better meets their needs than a teardrop model. They have plenty of interior space and an interior kitchen. Many models also come with interior seating areas and other amenities. When not in use, the camper folds to take up minimal space.

Nevertheless, setting up and taking down this type of camper is time-consuming, and the owner must practice doing so routinely. Going too fast can damage the camper. The camper sides are made of fabric, so the occupants may be exposed to the weather. Pop-up campers aren't well insulated, either, much like tents.

Users have limited access to the camper interior while traveling, so any items needed during the trip must be stored in the vehicle towing the camper. Furthermore, pop-up campers require more maintenance than their teardrop counterparts. Without this maintenance, mold and leaks are concerns.

Consider both options when choosing a camper. Factors that should be part of the decision-making process include comfort, convenience, price, and plans for using the trailer. Teardrop campers are ideal for those who want a sturdy camper that requires little setup. Pop-up campers are an excellent choice for those on a budget who need more space. People must decide what is most important to them and choose their camper accordingly. Doing so will ensure the proper selection is made.
