

Waving to the Airplanes: #MySundayPhoto “ 10.04.15

Description

We™re at the stage of toddlerdom (hey, it™s on Wiktionary!) where every new thing/word is repeated somewhere between 10 to 50 million times a day. One of those things is “œplane” or “œjet” every time she hears one flying overhead.

Oh, I should mention we live between two airports, one being the extremely busy DFW Airport. In other words, there™s a lot of planes that fly over us. We rarely noticed the flying vessels until now, since Avery calls out their presence upon each passing. We™re proud of our girl for everything she™s learning, obviously, but the repeated words can take a toll sometimes. First world problems, I know.

We encourage Avery with supportive words when she acknowledges a color, sound, object, etc, so now we have her waving to the planes as they fly by.

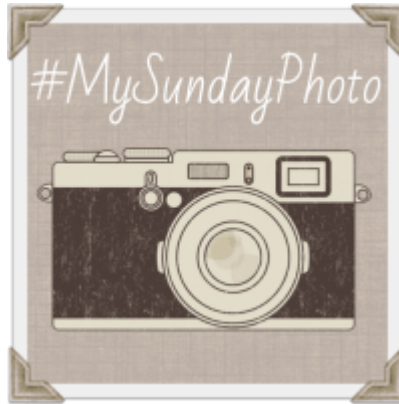

I™m not sure if she understands that she™s waving to people (like we told her), or just the actual jet and/or plane, but it™s cute nonetheless. Speaking of, we also try to explain the difference between jet and plane since she™s been using both words.

Essentially, all jets are planes, but not all planes are jets. The propeller driven planes and in a different category. All of this just goes over her head (ha ha, puntastic!), but I know she™ll eventually catch on.

Enjoy the rest of your Sunday!

Do you have a lot planes fly near your home?

Are there things you never or hardly noticed that your kid constantly discovers around your home now?

Date Created
2015/10/04

default watermark