

3 Extreme Winter Motorsports to Try Your Hand At

Description

If you see winter motorsports on TV, you might think they look thrilling. You may even feel like you want to give them a try yourself. If you crave the heart-pounding adrenaline rush that comes from pushing your limits, you might not be able to wait till you can try some of these activities for yourself.

For instance, if you visit a dealership owned by Karl Malone, Polaris models are available, and you might feel that the price is worth it. There are several winter motorsports that are worth considering, and weâ€™ll discuss three of the more appealing ones in the following article.

Snowmobile Freestyle Competitions

If you have looked at the fresh white powder outside your window and thought it resembled a blank canvas on which you can create a masterpiece, then a snowmobile freestyle competition might be for you. This activity is definitely not for the faint of heart, but if youâ€™re daring, thereâ€™s no reason why you canâ€™t give it a try.

These competitions are held in several different parts of the country. You need a regulation snowmobile to enter one. The X Games is probably the most famous example of this kind of event.

If you enter the X Games, you can power your snowmobile down a 70-foot ramp and jump off. Twists, turns, and other daring feats will earn you points, but you should not discount the very real danger element.

Snocross

Thereâ€™s also an activity called snocross. It involves a vehicle that most closely resembles a motorcycle with a sled attached to it instead of a traditional front tire.

These vehicles are made to ride on snow tracks. They can go up to a dizzying 60 miles per hour. At that speed, the snow zooms past on either side, and it feels like youâ€™re flying.

The courses created for these vehicles resemble the ones youâ€™d see for motocross. You can tackle jumps up to 30 feet high. Youâ€™ll also encounter hairpin turns and obstacles you must dodge while traveling at high speeds.

The Iron Dog Race

Dog racing remains popular among those who enjoy challenging winter sports. The Iron Dog Race is one of the biggest ones every year.

This race lasts five grueling days, and you must traverse a 2,000-mile course through some of Alaska's harshest terrain. You begin at Big Lake and stop at Nome, which is about the halfway point. From there, it's on to Fairbanks.

There are strict rules for when you must stop for breaks, which is for the safety of both the drivers and dogs participating. This might sound like a fun activity, but consider this: temperatures along this course can drop down to -57 degrees Fahrenheit. In the river basins and valleys, you might face even colder temperatures than that.

It's not an exaggeration to say that you risk life and limb by trying these events. Some individuals crave danger, though. If you're one of them, you might want to learn more about these scintillating options.
