

Going Review Update from Avery: The Art of Cure Baltic Amber Teething Necklace

Description

Hi there, itâ€™s me, Avery! You know, the reason my daddy (Going Dad) stays home all day and does things like make us hunt for breast pads. Yeah, real cool, dadâ€™s!

Anyway, since Iâ€™m the one wearing this Baltic Amber Teething Necklace from The Art of Cure, I wanted to share my thoughts. My dad first talked about it on this post.

The first day it came in the mail, my dad quickly put the necklace on me and stared as if I was supposed to do tricks. I donâ€™t know any tricks, so I just gave an awkward smile to get him to stop staring.

Okay, you happy?

Then he started trying to put it in my mouth for some reason, but it just fell out. Later that day dad told me he was wrong for doing this and that the necklace is NOT meant for chewing. He then went on to tell me about the proclaimed benefits of Baltic amber for teething babies. Exactly what these "teeth" are, I have no clue.

Most importantly, dad told me it has to be Baltic amber since it is the only type that contains succinic acid. Succinic acid is said to have a beneficial effect on our bodies by improving immunity, reducing inflammation, and act as a natural analgesic. These qualities make them popular for giant babies like daddy, he calls them adults, and normal babies like me.

Dad let me know that in order for these beneficial qualities to work, the amber needs to remain in contact with my skin. Apparently, it's the warmth from my body that allows the Baltic amber to release the oils that contain succinic acid.

There are many imitation amber necklaces out there, but The Art of Cure has their Baltic amber certified as being genuine. Definitely good to know since I don't like fakes! They even provide a certificate of authenticity to back their product 100%!

So, how do I like it after wearing it all the time for over a week now? Well, I still don't have these teeth dad talks of, but it doesn't really bother me having it on. Plus, I look pretty cute with it, no, I look pretty cute no matter what! So far, I've been like a regular baby with my fussy times and happy times, so I am undecided at this point.

Bath time approved!

These necklaces are very affordable and for what they claim, my dad says he'd get another one if mine broke. My mom isn't too excited about it, and she took it off of me last night because she thinks I get uncomfortable while sleeping. Really, mom?! Maybe if dad didn't put me in a straight jacket, er, swaddle, I would be more comfortable. I have been waking up earlier than the week before, but hey, I'm a baby, I do unpredictable things!

Yes, I see your hand above the cameraâ€¦..wowâ€¦.

My dad did let me know that The Art of Cure offers bracelets for anyone concerned with wearing a necklace. This sounded good to me as I think it would help complete my wardrobe! Maybe having both would help extra, who knows?

Anyway, the necklace is easy to wear and doesnâ€™t bother me during the day. If it bothers me at night, no one will know since I canâ€™t talk yet. But typing, as you can see, is much easier! Since I am only 4 months old, my dad says these teeth can still be months away, but heâ€™ll be sure to post another update on the necklace once the time comes.

Goodbye and thanks for reading! Now Iâ€™m off to go feed the puppies under my crib.
